Abstract

This paper provides a comprehensive literature review on the barriers and drivers of blockchain technology adoption in developing countries and how it affects their achievement of sustainability goals. This study adopts a systematic approach to identify and analyze relevant articles from various databases and journals. This paper also discusses how blockchain technology can contribute to the economic, social, and environmental dimensions of sustainability in developing countries by enhancing transparency, traceability, efficiency, and inclusiveness in various sectors such as agriculture, health, education, and finance. The paper concludes with some implications for research and practice and suggests some directions for future studies.
