Language, Literature and Style in Africa

A Festschrift for Professor Christopher Olatunji Awonuga

Edited by Arua E. Arua
Taiwo Abioye
Kehinde A. Ayoola
CHAPTER SEVEN

A LEXICO-STYLISTIC ANALYSIS OF KAINEN AGARY’S YELLOW-YELLOW

TAIWO ABOYE AND ESTHER AJIBOYE

Introduction

Creativity, the expression of a writer’s imagination, is drawn from the totality of the writer’s experiences. Writers use language, the common middle-ground and the writer’s communication tool, to convey or express their experiences as well as their cultures and backgrounds which they may not share with their readers. A people’s culture certainly includes their language (Bodley 2008). This implies that language use cannot be separated from the society in which it is used. Moreover, context is a major determinant of any act of language behaviour while choice of words and meaning derivations are factors that are related to context or environment (Bright 2006). Firth’s (1957:173) view of language as “occurring in a culturally determined context of situation” is, therefore, apposite. Eggins (2004:8) states that “our ability to deduce context from text is one way in which language and context are interrelated”. In the light of this, the chapter illustrates the relationship between language use and style, the manner in which the writer’s experience is conveyed, at the lexical level, to showcase the distinctly Nigerian or Niger-Deltan flavour of Kaine Agary’s Yellow-Yellow (2006).

Plot Summary of Yellow-Yellow

Yellow-Yellow is a prose fiction set in the Niger-Delta region of Nigeria. It recounts, in first person narration, the story of a girl, Zilayefa, fondly referred to as Yellow-Yellow, who was born to a Greek father and a Nigerian mother, and who struggled to find an identity for herself in Port Harcourt where she faced racial prejudice. She went through a phase of life where she had to deal with the opposite sex. The story raises such thematic concerns as oil spillages and vandalisation of oil pipelines in the Niger-Delta, and other social ills such as prostitution and examination malpractices, which are, indeed, symptomatic of contemporary Nigerian society. These thematic concerns, however, are not the focus of this study. Rather, the study is premised on the postulation that language use in the text will logically mirror that which is used by the Nigerian society, specifically the Niger Delta, in which the text is set.

Nigerian Literature and the English Language

Because of the utilitarian status of English as a world language, and its role and place as a national Nigerian lingua franca (Achebe 1975), Nigerian writers have made attempts at deftly using it to depict the linguistic communities on which their works are based. For example, in Cyprian Ekwensi’s Jagua Nana (1961), the heroine used pidgin expressions. Ken Saro-Wiwa’s Sozaboy (1985) likewise features a character, Mene, the semi-literate narrator of the events in the text, who mixes Nigerian English with Broken English or “rotten English” (p.30) (see Irele 1988: 337). Soyinka’s The Trials of Brother Jero (1964) also portrays the use of pidgin by Chume, Jero’s disciple. Other novelists, playwrights and poets adorn their works with local imagery and transliterations, all in a bid to maintain their Africanness.

Okara (1963) argues that:

> As a writer who believes in the utilization of African ideas, African philosophy and imagery to the fullest extent possible, I am of the opinion the only way to use them effectively is to translate them almost literally from the African language native to the writer into whatever European language he is using as his medium of expression. (quoted in Ohaeto 1988: 80)

This is closely related to Soyinka’s (1988: 107) position that:

> ...when we borrow an alien language to sculpt or paint in, we must begin by co-opting the entire properties in our matrix of thought and expression. We must stress such a language, stretch it, impact and compact it, fragment and reassemble it with no apology, as required to bear the burden of experiencing and of experiences, be such experiences formulated or not in the conceptual idioms of the language.
As a result of the interaction between the English language and the Nigerian culture, the language has been domesticated and nativised in Nigeria (Kachru 1992). Thus, Bamgboshe (1995:11) observes that:

Nativization of English in Nigeria is not limited to the usual features of transfer of phonological, lexical, syntactic and semantic patterns of Nigerian languages into English, it is also concerned with the creative development of English including the evolution of distinctively Nigerian usages, attitudes and pragmatic use of the language (emphasis ours).

The result of this continued contact between English language and the over 500 indigenous Nigerian languages is a locally-based English identity which Adegbija (2004:20) calls the “Domestication” of the English language in Nigeria. This is characterised by people using the language naturally and in a way that reflects their socio-cultural norms without unnecessarily sounding “bookish”. Nigerian English has shown some marked departure from the native speakers’ usage of English. This nativisation, also called domestication or indigenisation of English in Nigeria, is a natural response to the linguistic and socio-cultural needs of the people.

The indigenisation of English in Nigeria is clearly evident in Nigerian literary texts. In other words, Nigerian writers add vigour to the English language by vernacularising it (Ohaeto 1988). For example, Okara, in The Voice (1964) uses the idioms of his native Igbo language in forms that are easily understandable in English. Literary and linguistics scholars have, therefore, made attempts to study this creativity at different levels of linguistic analysis (see Ayoola 2012, for example).

Igbanusi (2001) has examined the Igbo tradition in the Nigerian novel, as reflected in the works of seven writers, and noted that the tradition is expressed through language use. This ranges from the translation of proverbs, idioms, images and culturally rich expressions to the transfer of Igbo words and expressions into English. There is also evidence of code-mixing and code-switching in Nigerian prose fiction (Ibhawoegbele and Edokpayi 2012). These scholars posit that the innovative use of lexical items has become a significant stylistic device in Nigerian literature.

In line with the foregoing, Yeibo (2011) explored lexical choices and their stylistic functions in Clark-Bekederemo’s poetry. Amongst other choices that reflect cohesion and thematisation, the study noted that the appropriation of indigenous idioms helped to effectively express cultural meaning, thus indicating that a writer can make choices from the alternative linguistic resources at his or her disposal. The choices, though, may be influenced, on the one hand, by the subject matter, and, on the other, by social and contextual variables.

From the foregoing, it is evident that Nigerian literary works are written in contextualised English language, one which clearly projects the imagery of the sociocultural contexts of Nigerians, and which gives the works a distinctly Nigerian brand.

The Lexico-Stylistic Approach

As a two-fold approach, lexico-stylistics incorporates lexicology and stylistics into analysis. Howard and Etienne (1999) define lexicology as the study of lexis. In Darbyshire’s (1967:139) view, “lexis is that branch of linguistics which deals with the major units of language that carry the burden of referential meaning”. Though lexis is generally perceived as the stock of words in a given language, it is not limited to this. It also includes certain phrases and idiomatic expressions which are larger linguistic stretches than traditional lexical items. Such linguistic units are seen in derivational relations, denotation, lexical relations and universals, which fall under lexical semantics. Saeed (2007:53) reinforces this fact when he argues that “the meaning of a word is defined in part by its relation with other words in the language”. By lexical-semantic relations we mean that meanings are realised in texts through appropriate lexical choices.

Stylistics, which is combined with lexicology in this study, is “the study of literary discourse from a linguistic orientation” (Widdowson 1975:3). The term, “style”, from which stylistics is derived, has acquired a number of meanings in linguistics. Leech and Short (1981:10) posit that it “refers to the way in which language is used in a given context, by a person, for a given purpose and so on”. They further add that “it is selection from a total linguistic repertoire” (p.11). Lawal (1997:6), similarly, describes style as an aspect of language that deals with choices of words, phrases, sentences and linguistic materials in relation to the subject matter and the sociolinguistic context of a literary text (cf. Crystal and Davy 1955; Awonuga 2009).

Polikarpov and Kurlov (1994) explain that social-functional, temporal and territorial factors form the basis for the fundamental stylistic qualification of vocabulary units. This is closely related to Ogunjisi’s (2000) submission that stylistic meaning is relative to contextual variables. Hence, stylistic analysis applies the principles of general linguistics to the examination of graphological, phonological, syntactic, lexical and semantic features of a text (Alo 1998; Dada 2004; Abioye 2008).
alternative linguistic resources at his or her disposal. The choices, though, may be influenced, on the one hand, by the subject matter, and, on the other, by social and contextual variables.

From the foregoing, it is evident that Nigerian literary works are written in contextualised English language, one which clearly projects the imagery of the sociocultural contexts of Nigerians, and which gives the works a distinctly Nigerian brand.

The Lexico-Stylistic Approach

As a two-fold approach, lexico-stylistics incorporates lexicology and stylistics into analysis. Howard and Etienne (1999) define lexicology as the study of lexis. In Darbyshire's (1967:139) view, "lexis is that branch of linguistics which deals with the major units of language that carry the burden of referential meaning". Though lexis is generally perceived as the stock of words in a given language, it is not limited to this. It also includes certain phrases and idiomatic expressions which are larger linguistic stretches than traditional lexical items. Such linguistic units are seen in derivational relations, denotation, lexical relations and universals, which fall under lexical semantics. Saeed (2007:53) reinforces this fact when he argues that "the meaning of a word is defined in part by its relation with other words in the language". By lexical-semantic relations we mean that meanings are realised in texts through appropriate lexical choices.

Stylistics, which is combined with lexicology in this study, is "the study of literary discourse from a linguistic orientation" (Widdowson 1975:3). The term, "style", from which stylistics is derived, has acquired a number of meanings in linguistics. Leech and Short (1981:10) posit that it "refers to the way in which language is used in a given context, by a person, for a given purpose and so on". They further add that "it is selection from a total linguistic repertoire" (p.11). Lawal (1997:6), similarly, describes style as an aspect of language that deals with choices of words, phrases, sentences, and stylistic material in relation to the subject matter and the sociolinguistic context of literary text (cf. Crystal and Davy 1985; Awoyiga 2009).

Polikarpov and Kurbov (1994) explain that social-functional, temporal and territorial factors form the basis for the fundamental stylistic qualification of vocabulary units. This is closely related to Ogunsiji's (2000) submission that stylistic meaning is relative to contextual variables. Hence, stylistic analysis applies the principles of general linguistics to the examination of graphological, phonological, syntactic, lexical and semantic features of a text (Alo 1998; Dada 2004; Abioye 2008). In addition, Halliday (1971) explains that a formal feature is stylistic if it is functional; that is, if that feature carries a particular meaning, effect or value. In this study, therefore, lexical features are explained along functional lines, especially with reference to the context of use.

The function of stylistics, according to balancing the influences of lexical and stylistic choices, suggests that contextual influences are also important.

Methodology

The methodological approach adopted in this analysis places emphasis on lexemes that give Yellow-Yellow its distinctiveness. Thus, this research involves the analysis of instances in the text where Nigerian English lexical items, Nigerian Pidgin expressions, lexical items from indigenous languages, loan words, and so on feature. The lexical choices are discussed on the basis of their associative (implied, based on context, time and background of the language user, among other things) and denotative (general and universally acceptable) meanings.

Because some of the data are sentences, the use of tables is avoided. For clarity, however, collected data are grouped into linguistic categories, some of which overlap. The categories are:

- Loanwords/Loan Blends/Loan Expressions
- Semantic Extensions
- Coinages/Neologisms
- Nigerian Pidgin
- Imagery drawn from the immediate environment

Presentation and Discussion of Data

Loan words/Loan Blends/Loan Expressions

Loan words, also referred to as “lexical variants” (Jowitt 1991:63), are words which, through borrowing, are incorporated directly into another language without any change in form (Treffers-Daller 2010). They are related somewhat to loan-blends. The difference, however, is that for a loan-blend, one element is a loan word and the other is a native element (Heffer 2005). In this study, loan expressions are used to refer to the direct transfer of entire structures from an indigenous language into English. The relevant lexical items in the text (italicised) together with their translations or meanings, are as indicated in items 1-11:
1. Ere ow'ama bien mo gbein mo daba, owei mo 'yaimo aki, hm hm' (p.15).
   (As the ladies throw their backside, the men should pick them up).
   (Ijaw)
2. "In my place, some oyinbo children were killed at birth (p.101).
   (white/white-skinned) (Yoruba)
3. to pounded yam and egusi soup (p.119).
   (melon soup) (Yoruba)
4. so we would play awigiri tapes (p.10).
   (Ijaw highlife music)
5. There was kekefia,... (p.19).
   (boiled black plantain (Ijaw)
6. ... can you buy me kilishi?" (p.85).
   (kebab, different from suya in spices and seasonings) (Hausa)
7. We bought... suya (p.94).
   (kebab; roasted meat on stick (Hausa), but widely known in Nigeria)
8. ... fufu for breakfast (p.100).
   (a dough-like dish made from pounded plantain or cassava, eaten with soups and stews) (Twi, but now a common meal in southeastern and southwestern Nigeria).
9. an elaborate embroidered adire boubou (p.49).
   (a large female gown [boubou] with tie-dye imprints [adire] (Yoruba-Senegalese blend) (greeting a young person says to an older person (to show respect); the literal translation is, "I am kneeling or I have knelt down"). (Ijaw)
11. "Turn ofogorius with the jobless boys in town." (p.34)
    (the root word is "ofogori", which means to be wayward) (Ijaw-English blend)

Item 1, a voice-over from a radio presenter (Agary 2006: 15), is aesthetically pleasing, as it infuses some level of orality into the setting, as well as adds local/cultural flavour to the text. Items 2-9 are loan words that have become Nigerianisms, especially as they (items 4-9) do not have direct lexical substitutes in English. In sociolinguistic contexts where these occur, borrowing is not unusual (Hoffer 2005; Durkin 2009).

As language is relatively reflective of cultural conventions in every society, English does not capture in its entirety the concepts Kaine Agary wished to express in item 10. Thus, she used the term "okoido", a form of greeting that literally means "I am kneeling or I have knelt down."
Presenting this in English would have been awkward, as it is not a feature of Standard English. More so, it embodies the culture of respect that is situated in the African context, as this is a mode of greeting reserved for the elderly.
Example 11 reveals a lexical innovation made possible through the derivational processes of affixation and conversion. Ofogori which is an infinite verb in Ijaw (meaning “to be wayward”) is imported into English and, through the suffixation of -ous, changed into the adjective ofogorious. These loans are, therefore, aesthetically and socio-culturally relevant to the linguistic composition of Yellow-Yellow.

Semantic Extensions

Ayoola (2012) observes that the English lexicon can accommodate new ideas and notions in particular contexts. Semantic extensions or semantic loans are those words whose meanings have been extended beyond those which are conventionally or generally recognised either “as a result of association with the meaning of a partly synonymous word in another language” or non-linguistic influence (e.g. cultural) in the development of a new semantic sense (Igboanusi 2001; Durkin 2009: 136).

The relevant lexical items, with their conventional and extended meanings, are provided below:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Example</th>
<th>Conventional Meaning</th>
<th>Extended Meaning</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>12.</td>
<td>that drivers used for okada transportation (p.86).</td>
<td>Motor-bike taxi</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>13.</td>
<td>Clara gisted with me all day... (p.59).</td>
<td>Chat (ted) (verb)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>14.</td>
<td>...the time for guys to “rush” the incoming girls (p.67).</td>
<td>Move fast</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>15.</td>
<td>Her mother, like me, was the product of a hit-and-run with a Portuguese trader (p.73)</td>
<td>Quick sexual affair</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>16.</td>
<td>I found out there were generations of yellows in the Niger-Delta (p.74).</td>
<td>Half-castes (noun)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>17.</td>
<td>And make sure he uses his raincoat o” (p.133).</td>
<td>Waterproof coat worn in the rain to keep the wearer dry</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

A Lexico-Stylistic Analysis of Kaine Agary's Yellow-Yellow
18. This was the boys' quarters, where the maids and servants of the house lived (p.55).
   Conventional Meaning: housing (including outhouses) meant for boys
   Extended Meaning: houses (outhouses) reserved for servants or young relatives.
19. I wanted to experience Lagos's go-slow traffic (p.87).
   Conventional Meaning: the first part of the compounded word refers to an industrial protest where workers work slowly
   Extended Meaning: a traffic jam

With the exception of item 12, which is an eponym, the semantic extensions are English words that have been contextualised to acquire new references. They are unique to Nigerians who use the English language; hence, the use of these lexical items is not peculiar, as they aptly reflect the Nigerianness of the text.

Indeed, the English language has been acculturated in Nigeria. It has become subjected to the tool of acculturation and contextualisation. Thus, it has been beaten into the desired shape (see, Soyinka 1988) in Yellow-Yellow to yield appropriate semantic extensions.

Coinages/Neologisms

Coinages/neologisms are lexical inventions; they result from morphological processes that either build upon pre-existing morphemes, or totally create new ones (Yule 1996). Some coined lexical items in Yellow-Yellow are:

20. The boys had come with two bottles of shine-your-eye (p.15).
   Translation: alcoholic drink
21. We went to a head-down boutique (p.17).
   Translation: an open market for second-hand clothes sold cheaply and usually spread on a mat at a roadside
22. I was a JJC (p.61).
   Translation: (Johnny Just Come); a derogatory term used to denote someone new to an environment.
23. the much-touted October Rush (p.67).
   Translation: Frantic chasing after female freshmen in Nigerian universities by senior male students.
24. ... he had yams for legs, perfectly yamulous legs (p.23).
   Translation: ... muscular.
25. Girls did anything to get a whitey (p.37).
   Translation: a white man/white men
26. There was even much less regard for born-troways such as me ...
(p.74).
Translation: children born outside wedlock or illegitimately
27. The pepper soup was very good (p.91).
Translation: soup made from meat, poultry or fish, containing chilli pepper. No oil is added
28. I found myself drawn to Admiral like a fly to a gourd of palm wine (p.139).
Translation: sap tapped from the terminal bud of palm trees. It is an alcoholic drink.

The lexical items identified above are largely descriptive coinages. Descriptive coinages are alternative constructions intended to describe certain socio-cultural elements that are not directly expressible in Standard English, but that exist in the Nigerian English lexicon. “Shine-your-eye” (item 20), for instance, describes the effect of the drink; it paints the bold, daring expression that the affected wears after consuming the drink. Item 21, “bend-down boutique” derives from the manner in which clothes and other materials are purchased in an open market - that is, bending down to pick the desired items. The addition of “boutique” to this coinage is more of a sarcasm; it mocks those who patronise such open markets, as normal boutiques in Nigeria are generally for the rich and well-to-do. Item 24, “Johnny Just Come”, refers to someone who just came into a setting, probably from a journey. It derives from “Johnny + just + come”. In Nigeria, a JJC is, therefore, someone who is yet to adapt to the ways of life of a group. JJC’s require some time for enculturation. Another example of this descriptive coining is seen in item 25. Since the rush to woo girls is an October phenomenon in Nigerian tertiary institutions, depicting the beginning of a new academic year/calendar, the term “October Rush” (item 25) seems appropriate. It is a Nigerianism that is easily understood in Nigerian tertiary institutions.

It is clear that some of the coinages underwent certain morphological processes; hence, they were formed through the suffixation of derivational morphemes. Items 24 and 25 are examples:

yamulous = yam + ulous
whitely = white + y

“Yamulous” (an adjective) is derived from the addition of the suffix “-ulous” to “yam” (a noun). Thus, “yamulous” means “being characteristic of a yam”. In other words, the large calf muscles are now compared to a tuber of yam, which is a popular food in Nigeria. It is not unusual for Nigerians to metaphorically refer to large calf muscles as “yams”. The next item “whitey” is also formed through derivational suffixation. However, unlike “yam”, the word “white” is not a Nigerian English expression. In other words, “whitey” is a noun derived from the adjective “white”.

The morphological process of compounding is at work in born-throwaway:

born-throwaway = born + throw + away

It merges three independent words (morphemes), “born”, “throw”, and “away”. It is a contracted and compressed single unit that connotes an illegitimate child abandoned by either or both of his or her parents. The act of “throwing away” is similar to being abandoned or rejected. Another interesting item is the descriptive term “palm wine” (palm + wine). It denotes wine that is derived from a palm. Hence, the headword is “wine” while the adjective that describes it is “palm”. Both items and others already identified are contextually Nigerian, and to some extent, African.

From the foregoing, it is evident that the use of coinages that are largely Nigerian help to properly situate Yellow-Yellow as Nigerian, and by extension, to function appropriately in its overall aesthetic composition.

Nigerian Pidgin

In this category are some of the instances of the use of Nigerian Pidgin (NP) in Yellow-Yellow. It should be noted that NP has not been codified and, therefore, that there has been no agreement regarding its word stock and grammatical rules. In view of this, examples of NP sentences are provided and discussed. Some of the lexical items are also highlighted when necessary:

29. ... leaving behind his planted seed in my mother’s belle (p.7).
   Meaning: “belly”. In this context, it means womb/pregnancy, used interchangeably.

30. Port, no be like village o,...You go learn boku and meet boku people, but you no fit survive city life if you slow o (p.53).
   Meaning: Port (short for Port Harcourt) is quite different from the village, ...you'll learn a lot and meet so many people, but smartness is the key to survival in the city.

31. Market day?... E day (p.70).
   Meaning: is anyone alighting at the market?... a response in the affirmative.
The suffixation:erian English adjective "throw", and "mami-wata" which connotes an act of giving to parents. The act of throwing is repeated. Another word is "wine" (from yam + wine). It varies in meaning; "wine" is used in phrases and others in the name of a town, African. Another phrase that is highlighted in the text is the Nigerian, and the composition.

Nigerian Pidgin (NP), an unofficial lingua franca of the country, is well understood, especially by the average Nigerian. Noticeably, the language of many of the characters in Yellow-Yellow is dominated by NP which also has a distinctive vocabulary, some of which are: belle (belly or womb) (item 29), boku (plenty) (item 30), mami-wata (mermaid) (item 32), brodas (brothers) (item 34), sabi (know, understand) (item 35) and oga (boss) (item 36). NP is so dominant that Sisi’s sales representative hardly speaks in English; her language use is almost entirely NP (see, for example, item 30). NP is also the language of communication in commercial buses (item 31), used by the cook (item 35), the driver (item 36), the police (item 34) and so on. Even in the Port Harcourt metropolis, NP is spoken by and to Royal Hotel staff (items 32 and 33). It is the language of the common class, and one of wider communication. However, esteemed members of the society, those who have access to the corridors of power in Yellow-Yellow—Sisi, Lolo, Admiral, Kamal—are content with restricting themselves to the English language, which truly defines their strata on the social ladder. This reveals that some still do not see NP as a language of prestige (Igboanusi 2008; Ativie 2011); they perceive it as inferior and not representative of their social status and would hardly speak it.

The use of NP in Yellow-Yellow, therefore, illustrates social frictions within the Nigerian society, creating a distinction between the highly-privileged and the ordinary people. The text, through its lexical choices, simulates the social realities of the Nigerian society.
Chapter Seven

Imagery Drawn from the Immediate Environment

Certain lexical items help to create images that give a text its peculiar expressive beauty (Yeibo 2011). Imagery can be interpreted on two levels—the literal and the metaphorical (Ugwu 1990). While literal meaning is usually denotative, metaphorical meaning is influenced by presuppositions and sociocultural contexts. Some of the imagery in Yellow Yellow are listed below:

37. ... the spirits of the water would tie my womo and make sure that, for my ungratefulness, I never experienced the joys of motherhood (p.10).
38. His skin was the colour of ripe plantain peel (p.19).
39. ...like a rough current against a canoe (p.23).
40. ...my heart pumping... as if it had been entwined in a fishing net and thrown into the murky waters of the River Nun (p.34).
41. ...as though the water spirits had tied the fishes' wombs... (p.39)
42. Her skin as the dark brown of palm kernel soap and was of the silky smoothness of refined palm oil (p.51).
43. I found myself drawn to Admiral like a fly to a gourd of palm wine (p.139).

The listed examples are sourced from the immediate environment. They are indicative of the symbiotic relationship between the language of Yellow-Yellow and the culture of the people. The religious values upheld by the people of Niger-Delta are observed in texts 37 and 41 which refer to water spirits and their power over reproduction of both humans and animals. The metaphoric meaning of this suggests "barrenness" where there should be abundance.

The constant reference to water also creates the Niger-Delta scenery (it is a geographical delta), the physical setting of the text. Items 37, 39, 40, and 41 effectively capture the water symbol—spirits of the water, canoe, fishing net, murky waters of the River Nun, water spirits, fishes' wombs, etc. The simile in Item 38 is also drawn from the immediate environment. Plantain is a staple food in Nigeria and this makes it a suitable image. The author did not use such abstract imagery as "his skin was the colour of a blooming sunflower"; rather, she drew elements that would fit the setting. "Palm kernel soap", "refined palm oil" (item 42), "gourd of palm wine" (item 43) are all typical of the palm trees in the rainforests of Nigeria. These choices undoubtedly add aesthetic value to the text as well as place the message in proper perspective.
Conclusion

The lexical choices in Yellow-Yellow have been stylistically made to create a synergy between the language used in the text and the environment in which it is used. In other words, the linguistic inspiration and style of Yellow-Yellow is largely Nigerian. The inspiration is seen in the use of loanwords, loan-blends, and loan expressions; semantic extensions; coinages; Nigerian Pidgin; and imagery drawn from the immediate environment. These choices are aesthetic and socio-culturally relevant to the linguistic composition of the text, as the culturally rich expressions are able to provoke vivid images the reader can readily identify with. Thus, the possibility of misinterpretation, particularly by the Nigerian reader, is highly reduced. In addition to this, there are also lexical choices that indicate that the English language has indeed been acculturated in Nigeria. Again, the lexical choices that the author makes for the characters even capture the social status of English in Nigeria.

All of these findings, including, for example, the use of NP to create a distinction between privileged and ordinary people, portend that the lexico-stylistic markings of the text are “territorial” and “sociofunctional” (Polikarpov and Kurlov 1994). They acquire a hue of Nigerianness and are functional in (re)creating the territorial setting of the text and in providing aesthetics.

References

Chapter Seven

Irele, A. “Ken Saro-Wiwa” In Y. Ogundiyi (Ed.), Perspectives on Nigerian Literature: 1700 to the Present 2. Lagos: Guardian Books, 1988; 333-344.
Kachru, B. B. “Teaching World Englishes”. The Other Tongue: English
Leech, G. and Short, M. H. Style in Fiction: A Linguistic Introduction to Ogunsiji, A. “Introductory Semantics”. In A. O. Babajide (Ed.), Studies
Ohaeto, E. “The Other Voices: The Poetry of Three Nigerian Female Writers”. Canadian Journal of African Studies/Revue Canadienne des Attempt of Analysis of System Correlations (According to the Data of http://www.philol.msu.ru/lex/articles/kurpol_en.htm (8 August 2014)
Saro-Wiwa, K. Sozaboy. Port Harcourt: Saros International Publishers, 1985.
—. Art, Dialogue and Outrage: Essays on Literature and Culture. Ibadan:
Treffers-Daller, J. “Borrowing”. In M. Fried, J. O. Östman and J.
Verschueren (Eds.), Variation and Change: Pragmatic Perspectives -
Handbook of Pragmatics Highlights (6). Amsterdam: John Benjamins, 2010: 17-35.
Ugwu, A. N. A Study of Some Aspects of Nigerian English in Nigerian Widdowson, H. G. Stylistics and the Teaching of Literature. London: