COMMUNITY BANKING AND RURAL DEVELOPMENT

Community banking plays an important role in promoting sustainable development in rural areas of low-income countries. This paper examines the role of community banking culture, entrepreneurial development investment and rural areas in Nigeria. The modalities, operations and challenges of community banking highlighted as well as optional pathways for resolving constraints to their growth and development. The contributions of community banking to sustainable economic development of Nigeria were revealed.

The communities feel their development is flawed. They fear their income is not sufficient to meet their daily needs. They have difficulties with full employment and rural infrastructures. They may suffer from a lack of skills, economic capacity, disadvantageous shifts in product markets, or a natural advantage, either spatial or biophysical. These factors can operate in either combination or separately, and diversified local economies, but attention to them is usually given the cause may be sudden and easily identifiable.

Communities have responded in many ways, including enhanced marketing, tourism, promotion of local entrepreneurship and business cooperation, infrastructure projects, education, subsidized land provision, financial subsidies, training programmes and so on (Skelly, 1995) (as cited in Walter, 2003).

In 1990, the unwillingness of the banks to meet the need of the rural community for banking services after the introduction of the rural banking scheme by the CBN in 1977 and the failure of the bank established in 1989 to perform in meeting credit need of the rural and urban areas and artisans prompted the federal government to introduce Community Banking in 1990. Community Banking (CB) was conceived to answer some of the observed weaknesses in the system to the grass roots. The Community bank is a unit bank intended to be a self-financing institution owned and managed by a community or group of communities for the purpose of providing credit, deposit banking and other financial services to its members. This is done largely on the basis of their mutual group responsibility, self-recognition and membership: the first Community Bank in Nigeria in Tundun Wada in Kaduna State on 1st November 1990. The then president Ibrahim Babangida explained that: "in other to bridge the conventional banking system and the people’s bank the idea of a community bank should be pursued." (Ehigiamusoe 2000).

Farms to fully involve the rural people in their own development and to aim at an improvement of the natural output had, hitherto, not been seriously considered. The main obstacle to rural development had been the exclusion of the masses in their own development programmes.

The wrong approach was adopted in solving the problems of rural development. Despite the vast resources which the full and effective participation of the people would have ensured, these resources were neglected in favour of bureaucratic inputs. (Idode 1989).

The Idode Mobilisation approach to rural development would recognise the people as partners in the development process. Where they become a part of the decision-making process, they would be committed towards ensuring that such decisions are fully executed. The approach would also enable the government to easily elicit the support of the people for the development efforts.

Further, where the people’s participation yield fruitful results they would be encouraged to move to ensure the further success of their collective endeavours. The initial success of such an approach is highly likely.
COMMUNITY BANKING AND RURAL DEVELOPMENT

Community banking plays an important role in promoting sustainable development in rural areas of low-income countries. This paper examines the role of community banking and its importance in Nigeria. The modalities, operations, and challenges of community banking in Nigeria are highlighted as well as optimal pathways for resolving constraints to their growth and development. The contributions of community banking to sustainable economic development in Nigeria are revealed.

The weak economic structures feel their development is flawed. They fear their income is not sufficient to meet the needs of their community. They have difficulties with full employment and rural infrastructures. They may suffer from high unemployment, disadvantageous shifts in product markets, or natural disadvantage, either spatial or biophysical. These factors can operate in either isolated, independent sectors or diversified local economies, but attention to them is usually greater in the former. The causes may be sudden and easily identifiable.

The willfulness of the Bank's response to the need of the rural community for bank services after the introduction of the rural banking scheme by the CBN in 1977 and the failure of banks established in 1989 to perform in meeting credit need of the rural and urban areas and artisans prompted the federal government to introduce Community Banking in 1990.

Community Banking (CB) was conceived to answer some of the observed weaknesses in the Nigerian banking sector. It was an effort to set up a financial institution owned and managed by communities for providing credit, deposit banking and other financial services to its members. This was carried out on the basis of the mutual group responsibility, self-recognition and members' self-help. The first Community Bank in Nigeria was established in Kaduna State in 1990. The then President, Ibrahim Babangida explained that, 'in order to bridge the gap between the conventional banking system and the people's bank the idea of a community bank has been used.' (Ethimare 2000).

The CB bank was to involve the rural people in their own development and to aim at an expansion of the national output had, hitherto not been seriously considered. The CB bank's approach to rural development had been the exclusion of the masses in their own development.

The mobilisation approach was adopted in solving the problems of rural development. The most important issue was the reorientation of the vast resources which the full and effective participation of the people would have to achieve. These resources were neglected in favour of bureaucratic inputs. (Idode 1989).

The mobilisation approach was aimed at getting the people involved in the development process. Where they become a part of the decision-making process, they would be committed towards ensuring that such decisions are fully executed. This approach would also enable the government to easily elicit the support of the people in the development efforts.

In conclusion, where the people's participation yield fruitful results, they would be encouraged to continue to ensure the further success of their collective endeavours. The initial success of CB banks will be sustained only if the people involved are given the necessary incentives and opportunities to participate meaningfully in the development process.
LOW CAPITAL BASE:
Most of the banks have low capital to effectively carry out their operations. Hence their impact positively on the community is low.

LOCATION AND INFRASTRUCTURE:
Most of the communities where these banks are located lack basic infrastructure like good water supply, health care system and electricity. These tend to hinder their operations.

AUD
Although this is a general problem in the banking industry we expected to see less of it in its since the banks are owned and operated by the communities. However this is not the

SUREANCE OF COMMUNITY BANKS DEPOSIT LIABILITIES
Currently the Nigeria Deposit Insurance Corporation does not insure deposits in banks. Because of this some people are afraid to lodge money with them.

POMPETITION FROM BANKS
The present trend is that most banks were reluctant to open new branches in rural areas but presently there is an increase in the number of bank branches being opened in rural areas. This has now brought about strong competition which these community banks may not be able to withstand. These banks in these communities are technologically advanced and have the best of systems in these branches, unlike the community banks which cannot acquire these systems as the will employ these well trained staff.

DROOM WRANGLING
Most of these Community Banks suffer from bad interpersonal relationship among board members as a result the banks suffer under such situations.

VISION OF LOANS NOT BACKED BY COLLATERAL
Many of these banks grant credit not backed by any collateral especially to board members. This led to financial squeeze and gradual erosion of the banks' capital base.

ATIONSHIP WITH CORRESPONDENT BANKS
Most community banks are not clearing banks; they therefore must attach themselves to banks with correspondent status. These banks that serve as correspondent banks will presently pay interest on their deposit in settlement banks or be attached to settlement banks. This is a big problem. They also pay interest and commission charges and have delays in clearing cheques through correspondent banks.

AGEMENT
In human endeavours where money is involved, the personal integrity of the workers is paramount. Top management staff must be professionally qualified and be vigilant at all times to be able to manage the banks effectively and as is presently lacking in many of the Community banks.

VISORY AUTHORITY
Now the National Board for Community Banks (NBCB) was supervising these banks. The central bank of Nigeria is involved in their supervision. These create a conflicting

The challenges facing these community banks, the ways to resolving them and development are explained below.

unusa (1999) the Central Bank of Nigeria (CBN) should promptly establish the Apex bank as the clearing house for the community banks. This will save them the as that they presently face in dealing with the commercial banks. For the full integration of by banks into the financial and non-financial system of Nigeria, the CBN and the Federal Finance should design policies that will ensure all the relevant finance and non-finance so there should be adequate monitoring of credit granted so that these credits are used by the borrowers for only businesses that the credits are approved for.

Moreover much emphasis should be placed on employing qualified and honest staff to these banks in order to reduce the incidence of mismanagement and fraud.
In addition, the Central Bank of Nigeria (CBN) should devise a way to bring the Community to a clearing system even if they are not to have a special clearing house. A law should be enacted by the government to make all deposits in community banks to be insured by NDIC to allow customers to lodge their money with these banks.
These banks should be encouraged to increase their capital in order to be able to increase operations. In fact a grant should be given to them to increase their capital and the use of these should be highly monitored.
The CBN should organise seminars, workshops and training geared toward increasing by creating awareness on good corporate governance and inculcating banking ethics and tionalism in senior officials of Community banks. In the area of supervision there should be an articulated demarcation between the role of CBN and NBCB in monitoring and supervising the community banks. It is our suggestion that the National Board for Community Banks should be instructed to continue operation and strengthened for it to succeed.
Finally, the Community Development Associations should have at least two members in the committee setup for these banks so that the reports that will come out of the audit will show a true and fair view of actual financial position of the bank.

PROBLEM OF RURAL DEVELOPMENT IN NIGERIA

In recent years the development policies of many African countries have shown increasing emphasis on the agricultural sector and rural development. In Nigeria the Third National Development Plan, 1975-80 also ranked rural development high in its policy objectives. According to the plan, it is necessary to recognise that about 70 percent of the Nigerian population live in the rural areas and have benefited relatively little from the rapid economic growth of the past few years.
This situation, in the welfare of the average Nigerian will therefore require a substantial increase in rural income. Accordingly, in the allocation of scarce resources in the course of plan-formation, priority will be given to programmes and projects directly benefiting the rural population, particularly projects to increase the income of small holder farmers and to improve the economic and social infrastructure in the rural areas. Third National Development Plan 1975-1980 (As cited in Idode 1989).

There is therefore, reason to believe that the question of how to accelerate expansion in the rural sector and how best to improve welfare for the masses of the people in the rural areas is the focus of considerable attention. But a great disparity exists between the promised goals of rural development and the actual results of implementation efforts.

The main reasons why attention should be paid to rural development in Nigeria are:
Firstly, the majority of the people live and find their livelihood in the rural areas.
Secondly, the level of rural-urban migration is increasing everyday as well as increasing the level of urban unemployment, housing problems, increasing crime rates and other attendant social

Thirdly, it is in the rural areas that the most disadvantaged people are to be found.
Fourthly, there is a general agreement that priority should be given to rural development especially agricultural development. The reasons for this agreement include the need to have continuous production of raw materials for industries and the feeding of our population.
Finally, to encourage the sitting of industries in the rural areas where the raw materials exist.
According to Igbozurike (1976) (as cited by Idode, 1989) Nigeria's development financing has been derived mainly from direct and indirect taxation of rural people who have benefited little or nothing from economic development activities. The author argues for a radical change in priorities in attitudes towards the rural sector as an economic and social necessity. There is need for improved social amenities, emphasis on agriculture and increased income and agro-based industries.

All past efforts by government to improve the pace of rural development in Nigeria especially through such agencies as Directorate of Food, Road and Rural Infrastructure (DFFRI), People’s Bank of Nigeria Limited, National Land Development Agency (NALDA), and Better Life for Rural Dwellers were not completely successful.

CONTRIBUTIONS OF COMMUNITY BANKING TO RURAL DEVELOPMENT

The search for a development strategy, which could lead to significant improvement in the socio-economic condition of members of poor households, led to the focus on credit. The underlying assumption of credit for development is that availability of capital is critical to the effort of enhancing income-generating capacity especially of the poor. It is assumed that the poor know what to do to enhance their socio-economic condition and that they remain poor because they operate from a slim economic base. This base, according to the proponents, and they are not many, could be strengthened by funds borrowed on affordable conditions. (Ehigiamusoe 2000).

According to Ehigiamusoe the enthusiasm over the coming of Community Banking in Nigeria has not be complete disappointment. Barely seven months after the opening of the first community bank in 1990 in Tudun Wada in Kaduna state, 1035 applications for the establishment of Community Banks were processed while 10 community banks had opened for business operations. Within three years some 879 community banks had been established throughout the country. By 1996, 1052 community banks were in operation in Nigeria.

By June 2002 N6.0b has been given as loans and advances. Total assets stood at N18.43b, the total share capital was N4.02b with paid up capital amounting to N2.57b. The total deposit was N10.62b, with demand deposit accounting for N3.1b, savings N5.7b and time deposit N1.875b. (CBN 2002).

These Community Banks have been able to encourage savings which hitherto was not common in rural areas. The savings are used in providing micro finance to small borrowers. The savings are regarded as partners rather than as faceless customer of the formal financial sector since they reside in the community.

Also some Community Banks are fully involved in managing community corporative apart from holding the deposit of such corporate societies. They provide financial and business advisory service to the rural dwellers. This was a service that was not available in the rural areas. Financial and business advisory services they provide have improved the way the rural dwellers manage their finances and operate their businesses.

CONCLUSION

Community banking has been able to reduce rural poverty and contribute much to rural development than it was expected. Though a lot still need to be done, their capital need to be assessed to make them have more funds to make impact in these rural areas. It has succeeded in mobilising savings hitherto kept under pillows and other unsafe places. This savings are now available for lending in the banks.

COMMENDATIONS

It is our honest opinion that this banks to be allowed to participate in clearing system to ease people to accept their cheques for business transactions. Also the CBN should find a way helping to increase their capital if it will amount to granting them soft-loans. Seminars, training conferences should be regularly organised for the staff to help them in performing their duties better.
